c. A force acting on or within a body or structure and tending to deform it; now usu. the intensity of this, the force per unit area.

As orig. defined by Rankine the stress was the equal and opposite reaction of the body to the force, rather than the force itself (see quots. 1855, 1856).

1855 W. J. M. RANKINE Misc. Sci. Papers (1881) 120 In this paper, the word 'Strain' will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces; and the word 'Stress' will be used to denote the force, or combination of forces, which such a molecule exerts in tending to recover its free condition, and which, for a state of equilibrium, is equal and opposite to the combination of external forces applied to it. 1856 THOMSON in Phil. Trans. CXLVI. 481 A stress is an equilibrating application of force to a body. Ibid. note, It will be seen that I have deviated slightly from Mr. Rankine's definition of the word 'stress,' as I have applied it to the direct action experienced by a body from the matter around it, and not, as proposed by him, to the elastic reaction of the body equal and opposite to that action. 1873 R. H. BOW Economics of Construction 45 note, The term stress expresses the condition of a part of the structure to the extremities of which are applied compressing or extending forces; the amount of the stress is measured by the magnitude of the force acting on either extremity; the strain is the change of length from elasticity which the part undergoes when subjected to the stress. 1873 MAXWELL Electr. & Magn. I. 59 The nature of this stress [in dielectrics] is..a tension along the lines of force combined with an equal pressure in all directions at right angles to these lines. 1876 Encycl. Brit. IV. 285/2 There are three kinds of stress, due to tension, compression, and shearing. Ibid. The ultimate strength of the material is measured by the maximum intensity of stress which it can bear, or in other words, by the stress which the unit area of cross section can bear. 1896 GREENER Gun (ed. 6) 545 The stresses upon a gun are a radial stress or 'pressure'; a tangential stress, or hoop tension..; a longitudinal stress. 1911 J. A. EWING in Encycl. Brit. XXV. 1007/2 Stress is the mutual action between two bodies, or between two parts of a body, whereby each of the two exerts a force upon the other... A body is said to be in a state of stress when there is a stress between the two parts which lie on opposite sides of an imaginary surface of section. 1925 J. CASE Strength of Materials i. 2 When we wish to give the stress a numerical value it is desirable..to refer to the stress in relation to the area of the cross section... The total force acting on a section, divided by the area of that section, is called the stress intensity or, more often, simply the stress. [Note] In future when we use the word 'stress' without qualification it must be understood to mean 'intensity of stress'. 1938 LAURSON & COX Mech. of Materials i. 2 Total stress is a force... Intensity of stress, however, is expressed in units of force divided by units of area. 1960 H. K. strew (struː), v. Also (now arch. and dial.) strow (strəʊ). Pa. t. and pa. pple. strewed, strowed; pa. pple. also strewn, strown. Forms: α. 1 strewian, streowian, streawian, 3–7 strewe, 6–7 strue, 7 streaw, 6– strew. β. 4 strouwe, 4–7 strowe, 5 strowhe, 6 stroe, pa. t. strouit, 6– strow. γ. 6 stroye, 7 stroy. See also STRAW *v.*¹ [Com. Teut. weak verb: OE. strẹwian, streowian, streawian, corresponds (exc. for differences of conjugation) to OFris. strewa, OS. pa. t. pl. strôidun, streidun (MLG. strôien, streien), MDu. strôien (mod.Du. strooien), OHG. strouwen, strewen (MHG. ströuwen, mod.G. streuen), ON. strá (but MSw. ströa, Sw. strö, Da. strø, are from MLG.), Goth. OTeut. root strau-; the ulterior relations are uncertain, but most scholars assume some kind of connexion with the Indogermanic root ster- (extended strā-*) in L. sternĕre, pa. pple. strātus: see STRATUM.

The OE. forms representing the orig. Teut. conjugation are: strie̯an*, etc. (see STRAY *v.*¹) = Goth. straujan, and pa. t. strẹwede = Goth. strawida. The original pres.-stem. in OE. (as in some other Teut. langs) was superseded by a new-formation after the pa. t. Owing to the influence of the following w, the umlaut -ẹ became diphthongized, producing the forms streow-, streaw-. The OE. forms with ẹ or falling diphthong are represented by the α forms above, while streow- pronounced with a rising diphthong gave rise to the β forms. According to modern usage, the two spellings correspond to the two pronunciations; formerly, the spelling strew was often used where the rime was a word like so, and conversely strow riming with new etc.

The rare γ forms stroy(e are app. borrowed from or influenced by Du. strooien.

The pa. pple. is now most commonly strewn or strown in passive tenses, esp. where there is no distinct reference to an agent; and strewed, strowed in active tenses.]

stride (straɪd), v. Pa. t. strode (strəʊd), pa. pple. stridden (strɪd(ə)n), (colloq.) strode. Forms: 1 strídan, 3 striden, 4 strid, (3rd pers. sing. strit), 4–6 stryd(e, 5 strydyn, 4– stride. Pa. t. 4–9 north. strade, 5 Sc. straid, 5, 7 strad, 6 Sc. straide, 6 stryd, 7 strid, 7–9 strided, 5– strode. Pa. pple. 6 stridde, 7 strid, 9– stridden. [OE. strídan str. vb. (once only, but cf. bestrídan, found once in pa. t. bestrád: see BESTRIDE v.) = (M)LG. strîden str. vb., to set the legs wide apart, straddle, to take long steps; cf. LG. bestriden to bestride (a horse). The vb. is not found elsewhere in Teut. with similar sense, but is formally coincident and prob. identical with the str. vb. meaning to strive, quarrel: OFris. strîda, (M)Du. strijden, MLG. strîden, OHG. strîtan (MHG. strîten, mod.G. streiten); of the same or similar meaning are the weak verbs, OS. strîdian (MLG. strîden), ON. stríða (Norw., Sw. strida; Da. stride is now conjugated strong); cf. OFris., OS. strîd, Du. strijd, OHG. strît (mod.G. streit) masc. strife, quarrel, ON. stríð neut. strife, grief, affliction (Norw., Sw., Da. strid), stríða fem. adversity, severity, stríð-r stubborn, severe (Norw., Sw., Da. strid).

The primary meaning of the Teut. root strīd-* is commonly assumed to be 'contention' or 'strong effort'. On this view the Eng. sense of the vb., 'to take long steps' (sense 2 below), would be a development from the continental sense 'to strive'. This would in itself be possible, but sense 1 would remain unexplained. The assumption of a primary sense 'to diverge' (cf. Skr. sridh to go astray) would account plausibly on the one hand for the sense 'to quarrel', and on the other hand for the sense 'to straddle', from which the sense 'to take long steps' would be a natural development.

The later examples show much uncertainty with regard to the conjugation. Perhaps (though this is far from certain) most people would give strode, stridden in answer to a grammatical question; but in actual speech and writing there is often hesitation as to the correct form. The pa. pple. rarely occurs; our material includes hardly any 19th or 20th c. examples of stridden, and not many of strided. In the pa. t. strode is certainly the usual form; but where the reference is to a single act and not to a manner of progression there seems to be a tendency to say strided ('I strided over the ditch').]

[ME. strīve-n (13th c.), a. OF. estriver (early mod.F. étriver: still preserved in some dialects), to quarrel, contend: of disputed origin.

The verb is not found outside Fr., the alleged Pr. estrībar cited by etymologists having no existence. It is commonly believed to be of Teut. etymology. According to some scholars, OF. estriver is f. estrif (whence STRIFE sb.), which is regarded as a modification of the older OF. (and Pr.) estrit, (= OIt. strido, strio), a. OTeut. strīdo-* strife, combat, related to strīdan* to fight: see STRIDE v. According to others, the OF. verb (of which, on this view, the sb. estrif is a derivative) is a. OTeut. strīban* str. vb. (Mid. G. strîben, early mod.Du. strijven, though these are prob. of secondary origin), f. root strīb-, of which the ablaut-variant strīb- is represented by the weak verb MLG. streven (mod. LG. strewen), (M)Du. straven, MHG., mod.G. streben, to endeavour, struggle (= sense 9 below), also (from LG.) Sw. sträfva, Da. stræbe. Both explanations present some unsolved difficulties; the former is more satisfactory with regard to sense, but the notions of 'conflict' and 'endeavour' easily pass the one into the other.

The strong conjugation (on the analogy of drive etc.) is found somewhat earlier than the weak conjugation which would be normal for a verb adopted from Fr., and has always been the more frequent of the two, though many examples of strived pa. t. and pa. pple. occur in writers of every period from the 14th to the 19th c. The Bible of 1611 has always strove in the pa. t.; the pa. pple. is strived, striven (one example each). The irregular pa. pple. strove (after the pa. t.; cf. the form stroven of the 16–17th c.) appears first in the 17th c., and remained somewhat common down to the middle of the 19th c., but is now confined to illiterate use.]

22. Gram. In various applications (opposed to weak). a. Of Teutonic sbs. and adjs., their inflexions, etc.: Belonging to any of those declensions in which the OTeut. stem ended otherwise than in n. b. Of Teut. verbs and their inflexions: Forming the pa. t. and pa. pple. by means of vowel-gradation in the root-syllable, as the Eng. give, break. Hence occas. used with reference to other Indo-Germanic langs., e.g. in strong aorist, applied in Gr. grammar to the 'second aorist' (ἔλιπον) in contradistinction to the 'weak' or sigmatic aorist (ἔλειψα). Occas. transf. with reference to non-Teutonic languages. c. In Sanskrit grammar, applied to the unreduced form of noun-stems, and to those cases which are formed on the 'strong' stem.

In these uses strong and weak are translations of the G. stark and schwach, the grammatical senses of which are due to Jakob Grimm. The reason for the choice of these terms to denote the two classes of declension was prob. that in German the formal distinction of case is weakened in the n declensions by the disappearance of the original case-endings. (Some scholars, following the letter of Grimm's own definition, inconveniently restrict the term 'strong' to the vocalic stems, so that the stems ending in other consonants than n form a third class, neither 'strong' nor 'weak'.) The ablaut-verbs were designated as 'strong' because in them the form of the root sufficed to express past time without the adventitious aid of a tense-suffix.

a. 1841 LATHAM Eng. Lang. 58 In A.S...there is the Weak, or Simple Declension for words ending in a Vowel (as Eage, Steorra, Tunga), and the Strong, or Complex Declension for words ending in a Consonant (Smið, Spræc, Leáf).

Eng. Tongue* §274 There is a slow eontinual tendency in these strong verbs to merge themselves gradually into the more numerous class of the weak verbs. 1946 BINCHY & BERGIN tr. Thurneysen's Gram. Old Irish 335 According to the way in which these stems are formed, two main classes of verbs can be distinguished, for which the terms 'strong' and 'weak' verbs are borrowed from the grammar of the Germanic languages. Strong verbs are without exception primary... Weak verbs are for the most part denominative. 1962 C. WATKINS Indo-European Origins of Celtic Verb II. 116 In the strong (non-derivative) verb..the present still exhibits numerous divergent formations.

c. 1863 BENFEY Sansk. Gram. §220 There are some nouns which have a strong and a weak form... Some have even three, a strong, a weak, and a weakest form.

strophe ('strəʊfi:). Pl. strophes (-fi:z), strophæ ('strəʊfi:). Also 7 in L. form stropha. [a. Gr. στροφή, lit. 'turning', f. στροφ-, στρέφειν to turn. Cf. late L. stropha, Fr. strophe, Sp. estrofa, Pg. estrophe, It. strofa, strofe, stanza.]

1. In Greek choral and lyric poetry, and imitations of this: A series of lines forming a system the metrical structure of which is repeated in a following system called the ANTISTROPHE. Also, in wider sense, one of two or more metrically corresponding series of lines forming divisions of a lyric poem. Hence occas. (after Fr.) used with reference to modern poetry as equivalent to STANZA.

structuralism (ˈstrʌktjʊərəlɪz(ə)m). [f. STRUCTURAL a. + -ISM.] 1. Psychol. A method, connected esp. with the American psychologist E. B. Titchener (1867–1927), of investigating the structure of consciousness through the introspective analysis of simple forms of sensation, thought, images, etc.

1907 J. R. ANGELL in Psychol. Rev. XIV. 64 If you adopt as your material for psychological analysis the isolated 'moment of consciousness', it is very easy to become so absorbed in determining its constitution as to be rendered.. oblivious to its artificial character. The most essential quarrel which the functionalist has with structuralism.. arises from this fact. 1927 M. BENTLEY in C. Murchison Psychologies of 1925 390 However important or trivial we shall find the accomplishments of structuralism to be, we must recognize the gain in clear thinking which accrued to Titchener's sharply drawn distinction between the analytical psychology of structure and the descriptive psychology of mental operation and functional performance. 1930 *Times Lit. 2. Any theory or method in which a discipline or field of study is envisaged as comprising elements interrelated in systems and structures at various levels, the structures and the interrelations of their elements being regarded as more significant than the elements considered in isolation; also, more recently, theories concerned with analysing the surface structures of a system in terms of its underlying structure.

MASCHLER tr. Piaget's Structuralism i. 4 We come upon at least two aspects that are common to all varieties of structuralism: first, an ideal..of intrinsic intelligibility supported by the postulate that structures are self-sufficient. 1972 *Sci. b. Linguistics. Applied to theories in which language is considered as a system or structure comprising elements at various phonological, grammatical, and semantic levels, esp. after the work of F. de Saussure (1857–1913).

1945 E. A. CASSIRER in Word I. 99 (title) Structuralism in modern linguistics. Ibid. 104 If the adherents and defenders of the program of linguistic structuralism are right, then we must say that in the realm of language there is no opposition between what is 'formal' and what is merely 'factual'. 1953 A. c. Anthrop. and Sociol. The theories or methods of analysis concerned with the structure or form of human society or social life; also, following the work of the French anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss (b. 1908), theories concerned with the deeper structures of communication from which the surface structures or 'models' evolve.

1955 R. FIRTH in Jrnl. R. Anthropol. Inst. LXXXV. 1 All British soeial anthropologists are structuralists in their use of the analytical principles developed by this method. According to Skeat the root is that of ON. strúg-r, MSw. strūgh-er, ill will, Sw. dial. strug, contention, strife, reluctance, struug, revengeful, Norw. stru, refractory, Da. dial. struende, reluctantly. Du. struikelen, G. straucheln (MHG. strûcheln, freq. of OHG. strûhhên, -ôn), to stumble. The change from (k) to (g) would not be a strong objection to this etymology, but the meanings of the Eng. and the continental verbs are widely apart. Possibly the word may be due to phonetic symbolism, the beginning being suggested by words like strive, strong; cf. TUGGLE v., TOGGLE v.[2]] stubborn ('stʌbən), a. Forms: α. 4 stiborn(e, -(o)urne, styborn(e, 5 stiburn, styburne. β. 5–6 stoburne, 6 stobburne, stoberne, -orne. γ. 5 stuborn, 6 stubberne, -(o)urne, stuburne, 6–7 stubborne, (6 stouborne, -urne, 8 stouborn), 6– stubborn. [Of uncertain etymology.

The commonly assumed derivation from STUB sb. presents no great difficulty with regard to the sense ('as if immovable as a stub or stock'), but is not easy to justify morphologically. It has been suggested that the word represents an OE. stybbor* f. stybb STUB sb., the final n being supposed to be due to a false analysis of styburnesse, stobournesse etc. (see STUBBORNNESS). But -or was not a living suffix in OE.; the words containing it are inherited from OTeut., and are not formed on noun-stems but on verbal roots. The early spelling of stubbornness with only one n is of no significance; more noteworthy, however, is the spelling stoberlie in our first example of the adv. The fluctuation in the vowel (see the Forms above) might be supposed to be an argument in favour of derivation from STUB sb. (OE. stybb, stubb, stobb*); but it should be noted that a similar fluctuation appears in the forms of STUBBLE sb., which is of Romanic origin.]

studding sail. Also 6 Sc. stoytene-, 7 studin-, 8 stutting-sail; and see STUNSAIL. [Of obscure etymology.

The earliest recorded form seems to point to adoption from MDu. or MLG. stôtinge, but this word is known only as n. of action from stôten to push, thrust, collide. Cf. however Du. stootlap sail-lining, stootkant border, which have some affinity of sense with the Eng. word. It has been suggested that the synonymous OF. estuinc, estoinc, estouin (mod.F. †estouine, 18th c.) may be an adoption of the Teut. word, the medial dental disappearing according to phonetic law. This, however, is not certain; the ordinary F. word for studding-sail is bonnette à étui, which suggests a derivation of estuinc from estui (mod.F. étui). The Breton misan a studincq, studding-sail, is adopted from English.

The ordinary nautical pronunciation is STUNSAIL.]

stuff (stʌf), sb.[1] Forms: 4–5 stof, 5–6 stoffe, 4–7 stuffe, 5–6 stuf, 5–8 stufe, (6 stoufe), 4– stuff. [ME. stoffe, stof, a. OF. estoffe fem., material, furniture, provision (mod.F. étoffe material, stuff, esp. textile material) = Pr., Sp., Pg. estofa, cloth, quality, It. stoffa piece of rich textile fabric. From the OF. word are med.L. estoffa, stoffa, Du. stoffe, stof fem., G. stoff masc., matter, stuff, whence Sw. stoff, Da. stof neut.

The ultimate etymology is obscure. Diez conjectured that the Rom. stoffa and the related vb. stoffare (STUFF v.) are derived from the OHG. stopfôn* (MHG., mod.G. stopfen) to plug with oakum, which (as explained s.v. STOP v.) represents a WGer. adoption of med.L. stuppāre to plug, stop up, f. stuppa tow, oakum. This is open to strong objections: the likelihood of a specifically HG. etymon for a Com. Rom. word is questionable, and the original sense of the Rom. verb appears to be, not 'to plug or stop up', but 'to garnish or store with something'. Whether the sb. is the source of the verb, or derived from it, is uncertain; the masc. form in It. stoffo, Pg. estofo quilted material, is undoubtedly a verbal noun.]

stump (stʌmp), sb.[2] [Of obscure history.

The late appearance of the word suggests that it is an adaptation (influenced by STUMP sb.[1]) of the far older Fr. synonym estompe, which, along with the related vb. estomper, †estomber, appears a 1700 in De la Hire Traité de la Pratique de la Peinture, published in Mém. de l'Acad. Roy. des Sciences 1666–1699 (1730) IX. 658. De la Hire evidently regarded the words as established in use; he suggests that estompe may be a corruption of étoupe (earlier estoupe) tow, link. This is impossible; most etymologists regard the sb. as derived from the vb., which some believe to be ad. Du. stompen or afstompen to dull, blunt, though there seems to be no evidence that either of these vbs. was ever used in the sense of F. estomper.

The stump for crayon drawing is elaborately described, as an instrument used by Fr. pastellists, in A. Browne's Appendix Art Painting (1675), but without mention of either the English or the Fr. name. Browne says (in this copying W. Sanderson Graphice ii. 78, published 1658) that a 'stubbed pencil' (app. = 'brush', not 'crayon' or 'lead pencil'), sometimes 'stuffed with cotton or bombast', was employed by some artists for the same purpose. Obviously a 'stubbed pencil' could be called in English a 'stump' (STUMP sb.[1] 3); and the equivalent Du. stompe could be employed in the same way. On the whole, considering that in the 17th c. the art of crayon drawing received much improvement in Holland, the likeliest view seems to be that the word stompe was applied (with no intention of using a technical term) to the 'stubbed pencil' by Dutch artists working in French studios; and that in the adapted form estompe it became the Fr. name for the improved instrument invented in France. On this view the Eng. word would be an adaptation of the Fr., as the relative chronology suggests.]

A kind of pencil consisting of a roll of paper or soft leather, or of a cylindrical piece of indiarubber or other soft material, usually cut to a blunt point at each end, used for rubbing down hard lines in pencil or crayon drawing, for blending the lines of shading so as to produce a uniform tint, and for other similar purposes.

1778 Encycl. Brit. (ed. 2) III. 2293/2 When the head is brought to some degree of forwardness, let the back-ground be laid in, which must be treated in a different manner, covering it as thin as possible, and rubbing it into [the] paper with a leather-stump. 1811 Self Instructor 544 Blend your shadows..with a stump made of paper. 1859 GULLICK & TIMBS Painting 316 The tints are rubbed in, and blended for the most part with the finger, although 'stumps' (Fr. estompes), and the point of the crayon.. are also used. 1860 W. COLLINS Woman in White vii, Near it were some tiny jewellers' brushes, a washleather 'stump', and a little bottle of liquid, all waiting to be used in various ways for the removal of any accidental impurities which might be discovered on the coins. 1862 Catal. Internat. Exhib., Brit. II. No. 5483, Drawing stumps in paper, leather, and cork. 1869 EASTLAKE *Materials Hist. stunt (stʌnt), sb.[2] colloq. [Of obscure origin.

Orig. belonging to the slang of American college athletics; not in the Century Dict. 1891 or in Webster 1897; our earliest quots. show that it seems to have been still current only among schoolchildren and college students. A notion which is app. prevalent in the U.S. is that the word is a variant of STUMP sb.[3], but in spite of the remarkable affinity of meaning, etymological connexion between the words is very unlikely.]

OF. style, stile, stil, estile, etc. (mod.F. style), ad. L. stilus (also incorrectly written stylus) a stake or pale, pointed instrument for writing, style of speaking or writing; f. root sti-* (? to prick): cf. STIMULUS. Cf. Pr. estil, Sp., Pg. estilo, It. stilo, stile, G. stil.

The spelling style, originally a meaningless variant of stile, owes its modern currency, both in Fr. and Eng., to the erroneous notion that L. stilus is an adoption of Gr. στῦλος column. In senses 7 and 8, the early history of which is obscure, the word may possibly be ad. Gr. στῦλος; but without further knowledge it is impossible to say whether those who first used the word in these senses were thinking of the Gr. or the L. word; quite probably they regarded the two as identical. As these senses may quite easily have been developed from senses of the L. stilus, there is no sufficient reason against treating them as belonging to the present word.]

IV. 27. a. A mode of expressing dates. Chiefly, Either of the two methods of dating that have been current in the Christian world since the introduction of the Gregorian calendar in 1582: viz., the New Style (abbreviated N.S.), which is the result of the Gregorian reform, and the Old Style (O.S.) which follows the unreformed calendar. The New Style is occasionally called the Roman Style, and the Old Style the English Style. In historical dates earlier than 1582, however, Roman Style, as used by modern writers, means only that the year mentioned is to be understood as beginning on 1 Jan.

The Julian calendar was based on the assumption that the tropical year consisted of 365¼ days. In order that the average calendar year should have this length, it was provided that the normal year should contain 365 days, but every fourth year 366 days. Down to A.D. 1582 the Julian calendar continued to be used by all Christian nations. In calendars and almanacs, the year began on 1 Jan. (like the Roman consular year); but for ordinary purposes the time of beginning the year was different in different places; in England, after some fluctuations, the beginning of the legal year was fixed for 25 March. After the adoption of the Christian era, the leap years were those whose number A.D. (reckoned from 1 Jan.) was divisible by 4.

The Julian estimate of 365¼ days for the length of the tropical year was too great by about 11 minutes, an error which amounts to one day in about 128 years. Hence in 1581 the date of 21 March for the vernal equinox, assumed since the early 4th c. in the rule for computing Easter, was 10 days too late. To remedy this inconvenience, and to prevent its recurrence, Pope Gregory XIII, acting on the advice of the Jesuit Clavius and other eminent astronomers, ordained that in A.D. 1582 the day after 4 Oct. should be reckoned as 15 Oct., and that in future the years which had a number ending in two cyphers should not be leap years unless the number were divisible by 400. The Julian date of 1 Jan. for the beginning of the year was retained. The difference between the old and new calendars continued to be 10 days until 1700 (the first disputed leap-year), when it became 11 days; in 1800 it became 12 days, and in 1900 13 days, from which there will be no further increase till 2100.

The Gregorian calendar (so called from the name of the Pope) was speedily adopted in all Roman Catholic countries, while the other nations of Europe adhered to their traditional reckoning. In the 17th and 18th centuries, it was often found necessary to state whether a date was according to Old or New Style, or to give both datings. As the nations which accepted the reform usually began the year on 1 Jan., not, as in England, on 25 Mar., there was for the March quarter (in addition to the other difference) a discrepancy in the number of the year between the Old Style and New Style dates.

In England and Scotland the Gregorian calendar was established by the Act 24 Geo. II. c. 23 (1751), which provided that the year 1752 and all future years should begin on 1 Jan. instead of 25 Mar. (in Scotland this rule had been adopted in 1600), that the day after 2 Sep. 1752 should be reckoned the 14 Sep., and that the reformed rule for leap year should in future be followed. Ireland followed in 1788. The use of New Style is now universal throughout the Christian world with the exception of certain countries of the Greek Church; in Russia it was officially adopted by the revolutionary government in 1918.

The use of stilus for 'mode of dating' was current in med.L., as a specific application of the sense 'usage' (cf. 19 above). In France the expression New Style (nouveau style) had been current before the time of the Gregorian reform, with reference to the change in the beginning of the year from Easter to 1 Jan., which took place in that country in 1563.
